In 1867, at the time the high duties on wool were imposed and the sheep industry crats control of congress.

It is natural enough that those whom designed to be practically a prohibitory tariff, the number of sheep in the state was officially given at 7,159,177 and the average price of wool, reduced to gold rates, 51 cents. In 1893 after twenty-six years of this "protection" increased somewhat within the last three years by the Mckinley tariff, the number of sheep has shrunk to 3,731,542, and the average price of choice Ohio fleeces to 25 cents. Number and price have both been cut squarely in two under twenty six years of 'protection."

1883 Senator Sherman said "the result of the policy of protecting the wool grower, as it is in all industries, is to gradually reduce the price." Under the operation of the existing law (the taxiff of 1867) the

Two Brands of Reformers One brand of tariff reformers thinks that protection is bad, and that it should be abelished. They think, though, that as every change in the tariff unsettles business, it is best not to shock trade business, it is best not to shock trade by any great or sudden change of rates. They prefer to reform gently, and to scale down protective duties at the rate of 2, 3 or 5 per cent a year, reaching a tariff for revonue basis in 1905 or 1910.

Another brain agrees that protection is a curse, and that any change of duties disturbs industry. They think, however, that the quicker the tariff can be reformed and protection abolished the quicker will be the recovery from the shock. If a tooth is bad, they prefer to have it extracted at one sitting rather than at a dozen sittings, in which case
